

appeals against the verdicts.

This is a salutary tale of ruined lives. On one side, we have the widow Mariane Pearl, who has given birth to the baby boy his father never saw. On the other, we have Sheikh's parents, Saeed and Qaoussia, and his brother and sister, Awais and Hajira, who are all naturally trying to save him from the gallows.

Levy's book, which reads like a fast paced thriller but is about real people, seeks to untangle how the trajectories of Sheikh's and Pearl's lives crossed with tragic consequences.

Let us be frank about things. There are many young Muslims, like Sheikh, in Britain and elsewhere who feel passionately about the oppression of their co-religionists all over the world. Sheikh's story is unusual in that he was not an uneducated jihadi ready for exploitation by militant mullahs. As a child, he was polite, polished and later he was arrogant enough to know he had a first rate brain.

He was born in London and educated at Forest School, a public school in Wanstead, and won a place at the London School of Economics with a grades in A level Economics and Maths and a B in General Studies.

WHO KILLED PEARL?: The journalist's murder was plotted by Ahmed Omar Saeed Sheikh (inset)

Curiously, although Islam was to become a big factor in his life, he could manage only a D grade in Religious Studies.

During a trip to Bosnia, he became a convert to the "cause", obtained weapons training in Afghanistan, and ended up in an Indian prison after a botched attempt to kidnap western tourists in Delhi. He and two others was freed in exchange for the 154 passengers of a hijacked Indian Airlines plane and began a new phase of his was without doubt the mastermind of the plot, the architect of the kidnapping. He was the man who set the trap into which Daniel Pearl fell.

Levy poses one of the most troubling questions in his book: "Is terrorism the bastard child of a demonic couple: Islam and Europe?"

This question will have more resonance in France than in Britain but what ought to be clear to Bush and Blair is that the West cannot bomb Afghanistan and Iraq with impunity without creating a new generation of Omar Sheikhs.

WARIS WHO? TV TOP DOCTOR RETURNS

AS THE BBC prepares to bring back Dr Who in "the most eagerly awaited comeback in television history", let us not forget Waris Hussein, to my mind the doyen of TV directors.

At an important stage in his career, Waris climbed into his Tardis and disappeared to the New World but he was all of 23 when he directed the first four Dr Who pilot programmes in 1963.

The science fiction series and its theme music are now part of legend. A particular favourite for viewers were the Daleks, machines which wanted to "exterminate" their enemies in their bid for control of the galaxy. The programme's hero, Dr Who (first played by William Hartnell), was a "Time Lord". He travelled between the past and the future in his space machine, the Tardis, which resembled a London policebox from the outside.

Since viewers have now indicated that this is the one programme above all they want revived, the BBC is commissioning a new Dr Who series.

Waris, meanwhile, has climbed back into his Tardis and rematerialised before me.

He remembers that back in 1963, he was about the only director of Asian origin on the BBC staff. He was taken on not because of any notion of having a token ethnic around the place but "more because I had read English at Queen's College, Cambridge".

The Waris-directed four pilots for Dr Who, set in the past around 100,000BC and called An Unearthly Child, were broadcast -- and the audience was hooked.

Waris quickly came back to direct another seven episodes, collectively called The Roof of the World.

Initially, the consensus was that the story line was far too weird to find acceptance from ordinary viewers.

"No director wanted to touch the thing," recalls Waris. "People were cynical about it. I was the most junior director there, so I had no choice. At that time, it was just a job."

Waris went on to direct some of the biggest dramas on television -- a black and white version of A Passage to India and "of which I am very proud", he says.

David Lean borrowed the video, was obviously inspired by it and went on to make his own feature film.

Waris also directed Edward and Mrs Simpson and The Glimmering Prizes, the first Asian to be given responsibility for big prestige projects. He later headed for America and was promptly forgotten in Britain. In 1998, he directed Sixth Happiness, based on Firdaus Kanga's autobiographical novel about a disabled Parsee.

He is just about to collaborate with his sister, Shama Habibullah, on an Australian-financed film, The Inheritance, which will be shot in Mumbai. Their late mother, Alia Hossain, published two novels, Phoenix Fled and Sunlight on a Broken Column, lamenting the partition of India.

Today, his name is practically unknown to British Asians who look baffled: "Waris who?"

The response from Waris is: "It would be nice if you stop them from forgetting me."

My dear chap, it would be an honour.

DOCTOR ON CALL: Waris Hussein